3. Acknowledgements

This research began with transcription of historical manuscripts by a team at Stennis Historical Society (SHS), including the author of this document. The inspiration for the transcription work was historical author Stuart McHardy.

Many people have sent useful information by email and website feedback, which has confirmed the exact locations of some Cantonments or added extra detail. The author wishes to thank them all once more for their contributions.

The interactive Cantonment map at bit.ly/StennisMap provides links to 18th c. Roy Military maps and to modern OS maps. The National Library of Scotland hosts digitised versions of the Roy maps online at maps.nls.uk/geo/roy - those and the OS maps were a huge help in finding referenced Cantonments.

Since the initial publication of this document, the author has taken an active role in a map transcription project of the National Library of Scotland. The main aim of the project was to transcribe over 33,500 handwritten place names (not just cantonments) which appear on the Roy Military maps and create a searchable gazetteer.

The completed gazetteer is a valuable resource for anyone wishing to use the Roy Military maps for historical research. The author wishes to thank the project leader, Chris Fleet, for guiding the project to a successful conclusion. The gazetteer can be searched or browsed at maps.nls.uk/roy/gazetteer

4. Terminology

Cantonment:	Military term incorporating barracks, garrisons, camps, posts
Cantonment Register:	Cantonment Register of the British Army in Scotland, transcribed by Stennis Historical Society, 2019
OS:	Ordnance Survey (maps)
Road Building Waypoint	Point indicating a section of a military road being constructed in a particular year. Not a Cantonment.
SHS:	Stennis Historical Society
Situation Reports:	Situation Reports of the British Army in Scotland, transcribed by Stennis Historical Society, 2019

5. Synopsis

This document contains information gathered by the author during research into the Cantonments of the British Army in Scotland, 1745-56. The initial purpose was to produce a map of the locations of the Cantonments.

In addition to the information which can be presented on printable and interactive online versions of the map, the research provided in many cases regiment names, troop numbers and marching destinations. This is given in the Detailed Cantonment Records at the end of this document.

6. Maps based on Cantonment data

As stated above, the data published in this document was originally gathered for the purpose of creating a map of Cantonments. A printable map has been created in a number of forms (some of which are reproduced below), with additional Cantonments and information (e.g. location names and colour-coded Cantonment types) being added to successive versions.

Printed Cantonment maps have been distributed to local education authorities in Scotland, and have also been sent to Members of the Scottish Parliament (MSPs). The location data has also been displayed as one layer on a historical map in the Common Weal's Atlas of Opportunity.

An interactive, online version of the Cantonment map is at bit.ly/StennisMap, and an animation of the changing layout of Cantonments over the decade studied is on our YouTube channel, www.youtube.com/@cantonmentmaps

Articles about the map have been published in the National and Scotsman newspapers and in iScot magazine, which has generated some of the feedback mentioned in the Acknowledgements section above.

7. Background Information

The research contained in this document was begun by the author as part of a project by Stennis Historical Society (SHS) to transcribe and publish manuscripts kept at the library of the National War Museum at Edinburgh Castle. Two of these are the Cantonment Register and the Situation Reports (see Source Documents section).

A team of members of SHS were carrying out the transcriptions, and one suggested producing a map of the Cantonments (a military term incorporating barracks, garrisons, camps, posts, etc). The author decided to take on the task. In the early days, this consisted of finding all the unique Cantonment location names in the documents being transcribed, recording them in a spreadsheet, and trying to locate them on online maps (modern Ordnance Survey and 18th c. Roy Military). When found, the OS map grid references for the locations were added to the spreadsheet. The Cantonments were then plotted by the author on an online map of Scotland with topographic features provided by Google, and then printed out. An interactive online version was also created at bit.ly/StennisMap.

The result was a map which showed all the Cantonments in an equal manner, i.e. red dots of an equal size. This provided no indication of the number of troops stationed at each Cantonment or for how long. Using different sized dots relating to troop numbers would have been misleading as huge numbers of troops would sometimes stay only one night at a location, whereas smaller numbers would occupy another location continuously for a decade. This would be addressed later, as follows.

The author then began searching through many other historical documents (see Source Documents section) for references to Cantonments, Posts, Barracks or however they were described. The aim was both to find additional Cantonments and to find details relating to every date upon which each location was recorded as being in use. This meant that a picture could be built up as to how often and for how long a particular site was used as a base or a halt for troops, and which regiments were there in what numbers.

This new requirement to record information on the use of Cantonments on multiple dates (sometime 50 or more dates) was beyond the reasonable purpose of a spreadsheet. All the data was imported into a database, which relates one or many date records to each location record. For example, a location record was created for Ruthven Barracks, containing such data at the English & Gàidhlig names, the Ordnance Survey grid reference, and links to the location on online maps (OS & 18th c. Roy Military).

Each time a Cantonment was found in one of the historical documents (for a new date), a date record was created containing such information as the source document and page number, the regiment which occupied the Cantonment, with how many men of what ranks, and for how long if known (often for a complete Summer or Winter period). These date records, e.g. for Ruthven Barracks, would all be linked to the original location record containing the common information as described above.

In addition to gathering date-related information for Cantonments, the author categorised them into five types: Temporary Camps (one night up to several weeks), Long-term Camps, Posts (small, often remote), Fortifications (castles, defensible buildings) and Staging Posts (overnight stops on supply routes from the Scottish/English border).

This categorisation of Cantonments was added to the printed and the interactive online versions of the Cantonment map, in the form of different coloured place names & icons for the five different categories. The date dimension was added to the interactive online map at bit.ly/StennisMap by displaying the range of years of occupation on a pop-up information box which appears when a marked location is clicked on.

In addition to the interactive map, an animation was created of the changing layout of Cantonments over the decade studied. It can be viewed on our YouTube channel, www.youtube.com/@cantonmentmaps.

So, the shortcomings of the original static Cantonment map were overcome by creating interactive and animated maps showing the Cantonment categories and the years of occupation. However, there is a limit to how much information can be shown on even an interactive or animated map, and hence the research data is published below in tabular format.

The research data in the first edition of this document was the result of six months full-time research and analysis by the author. It has been used in the creation of the printed and online maps, and as the basis for media articles. No matter how exhaustive a search is made, there will always be additional relevant information which has not yet been discovered. However, the research so far is presented below, including updates since the first edition.

8. Tabular data format

The research being published in this document is shown in the form of two sets of tables, shown in the Summary of Cantonments and the Detailed Cantonment Records sections.

The former are a quick reference, giving the Cantonment name, type and OS map grid reference.

The detailed records are a modified version of the database entry form, showing only data relevant to this publication. A table is given for each of over 600 Cantonments, showing the common data for the Cantonment (names, OS grid reference, etc) and from one to 50+ date records as described above.

Consideration was originally given to publishing the research data as webpages on the SHS website, but the huge number of webpages required would have been a burden to create and maintain. More importantly still, the data could have been lost to posterity should the website have ceased to exist. So, a PDF file was created instead. It is planned that the format will continue to be supported in the future (especially PDF/A archive format) so that digital information stored by libraries does not become unreadable in future.

The detailed record tables are included as graphics images, which are screenshots of the database tables as displayed on a widescreen computer monitor. This was done to minimise the effort needed to create and update this document, using automation in the form of custom-written computer software to create and process the images. Navigating manually through over 600 Cantonment records, taking screenshots, cropping them to size, compressing the image sizes, and adding them all to a PDF manually would have been a very time-consuming task. However, the author wrote computer programs to do all this at the click of a mouse – so future updates can be done relatively easily.

An acknowledged downside to this is that the detailed tabular data is not searchable or selectable. Searching isn't much of an issue as there is a table per Cantonment and they are listed alphabetically. However, the text can't easily be copied or imported into other documents, which is a limitation of the time-saving way of creating this document. Optical Character Recognition (OCR) is an option to deal with this.

A custom report could be created using Structured Query Language (SQL) to extract information from the database for display in tabular format, however that would add extra complications which have been avoided using the current process.

It is assumed that the tabular data in this document will mainly be viewed on a computer with a reasonably sized screen (or laptop plugged into a TV), and only used for quick reference on mobile phones with small screens.

9. Miscellaneous Information

1. Dates – A date is stored in each date record of a Cantonment. This is normally taken from the specified page of the source document or one of the previous pages if there isn't one. For an overnight stop at a Cantonment only one day's date is required for that record. However, there are many where the location of troops is indicated as being for the 'Summer' or 'Winter' period.

Often the source document will additionally say that 'Summer' stretches from May-Oct or May-(beginning of)Nov, with 'Winter' being the remaining months. These Summer & Winter labels are also recorded if they were in the source document. In this case the date recorded in the tables below has been standardised at 1st July for a Summer Cantonment and 1st November for a Winter Cantonment, unless a specific date has been given in the text.

In some cases dates have been estimated. For example an order may have been given for a regiment to march to a particular Cantonment but there is no record of when they arrived. A rough calculation has been done in that case as to how long it took for the order to arrive and then how long for the march or ride on horseback.

2. Page Numbers – For source documents which have been transcribed by SHS, e.g. Cantonment Register (CR), page numbers are those used in the transcription, which may not be the same as in the original document. The CR manuscript is of a large physical format where a single page of handwriting can equate to several A4 pages, depending on the amount and size of writing. Also, the NLSMS10691 (see Source Documents section) manuscript has writing from both ends of the 'book', with blank pages in the middle, so the pages at the back were labelled by SHS as Appendix P1, etc.
3. Multiple source documents for same date – in some cases two source documents are quoted for the same date/location. This is partly because they add different detail on the same events, and partly because they often provide mutual confirmation of what happened. In some cases they contradict each other in terms of what regiment was there in what numbers, but where this happens it is pointed out in the Additional Info field.
4. Only what is known can be reported – obvious, perhaps, but it means that if there is a gap in the years during which a particular Cantonment was recorded (in this document) as being used, that doesn't indicate that it wasn't in use. It may just be that no record was made or that it hasn't yet been discovered by the author.

5. Location names are sometimes duplicated, as there are two or more cantonments in different parts of Scotland with the same name (e.g. several Tarberts). These are distinguished by a number after the name, by OS map grid reference, and other record information like the exact spelling of the name(s) recorded from the source document(s). The interactive online map at bit.ly/StennisMap can be used to find the Cantonments, which are listed alphabetically under each Cantonment type at the side of the map.
6. Spelling of regiment names is as per the source document. The same is true of historical location names in the date records, except that 'ss' is written in place of the contemporary 'fs' or 'Ss' in the source document, e.g. 'Glen Dessery' instead of 'Glen Defsery' or 'Glen DeSsery'. This is worth remembering if searching pages in the source document for more information.
7. The English place names given in the Summary of Cantonments table and in each location record in the Detailed Cantonment tables are generally those found on modern OS maps. However, as just mentioned, each date record for a Cantonment gives the name as spelt in the source document. For example, Ruthven Barracks is variously described as Ruthven, Ruthvan, Ruthvaine, Ruthven in Badenoch, Ruthven in Badenough, etc.
8. Gàidhlig place names in the tables below come from a number of sources. Many 'English' names for places in the Highlands and on some islands (e.g. Skye) are corrupted versions of original Gàidhlig names. The author, a Gàidhlig speaker, is aware of the more common original names. Resources consulted for other ones include ainmean-aite.scot, faclair.com and tobarandualchais.co.uk, with a complete list of resources given at the bottom of the Gàidhlig language map included in this document.
9. Some people have made the understandable complaint that the printed Cantonment maps don't show all the Northern Isles, especially Shetland. There are good reasons for this which are dealt with in detail in the FAQ section of the Stennis website bit.ly/stennishs and therefore not repeated here.

10. Caveats on identified Cantonments & locations

The aim of this research is to show the geographic and time based distribution of British Army troops across Scotland in the time period under consideration. Pinpointing exact buildings which were occupied is not the primary purpose.

Locations of identified Cantonments are often approximate, depending on whether a settlement name or other identifying information is given, or the location of a settlement is shown on the Roy Military Map but which perhaps no longer exists (e.g. due to Highland Clearances).

In the case of a hut, often used for remote outposts, there is probably no trace left at the site. Castles are of course easy to pinpoint. 'Fort Cumberland' in Aberdeen is well documented and identifiable as it was originally built as a school/hospital and later formed part of Robert Gordon's College.

The date records for a Cantonment give information related to traceability. If a particular location, perhaps a field or an area of a town, was occupied for one night of a long-distance march then it can't be expected that a ruined barracks building would be found there today.

Note that the Cantonment Register, the largest single source of this research data, contains many records of places only used for one or a few nights, and these are recorded as being Cantonments just as much as locations occupied for a decade. As mentioned in the Background Information section above, Cantonments were allocated one of five different types for this study.

11. Errata

In researching and recording information for over 600 Cantonments and 4,400+ associated date records, there are bound to be errors. In the event of errors being discovered, or additional information being available, it would be helpful if readers could inform SHS at stennis.hs@gmail.com with the subject line of 'Errata' to enable automatic filtering [note the dot between 'stennis' and 'hs'].

15. Summary of Cantonments

The following Cantonments can be viewed on the interactive map at bit.ly/StennisMap. Clicking one of the location icons will bring up an information window with links to the Roy Military Maps and the modern Ordnance Survey Maps.

The former are provided by the National Library of Scotland. Note that overlaid on the Roy Military Maps is a slider control which if moved reveals the same location on the 1920s Ordnance Survey map, for comparison. However, since the Roy maps were drawn by hand they don't exactly line up with the OS maps underneath.
